This latter procedure has, perhaps, never been adopted by any other president.

The personal point of view of the administration evidently assumed that the public rights were paramount to. those of the dispudant railroad managers and operators. Mr. Wilson, as the chosen representative of the American nation, doubtless succeeded in impressing upon the parties to the controversy the right of the government to intervene. CLEVELAND, O., Sept. 16 .- The threat of a general railroad strike carried no such dread to Cleveland as to many large cities. While Cleveland is intersected by six railroad systems. it is also the local point for a system of brick highways that is regarded by experts as the most complete and substantial in America. When fear of a strike was at its highest, plans were practically formulated for making Cleveland independent of rail transportation so far as the necessities of life are concerned.
